The Energy Sector: Oil and Gas Loan Data

Why Does the Federal Reserve Question the Data?

We have been in a low oil price environment for some time now. While this is good news for oil importing countries like the U.S., it hurts oil producing states like Texas. Why is Texas hurt by low energy prices? Because Texas is one of the states with the highest concentration of energy-related industries and lower prices translate to lower revenue. Oil and gas prices also have implications on financial institutions as they participate in lending activity with companies in the oil and gas industries. This information is key as the analysts at the Federal Reserve monitor the effects of lower prices on the U.S. economy.

Oil and gas lending constitutes about 2 to 3 percent of large bank portfolios. The majority of oil and gas loans on large bank’s books are syndicated, hence diversified, through the Shared National Credit Program. Regulatory agencies know that the highest risk in oil and gas from a credit lending standpoint comes from loans to exploration and production components as well as service companies. The Federal Reserve System relies heavily on energy-related loan data provided by your institutions. Currently there is no specific line item or schedule related to energy loans, but they are included with Commercial and Industrial Loans and other items within the reports.

Your institutions can help us better understand your data by providing contextual responses to your energy-related loan data. The Eleventh District is an important energy-producing district, and our statistics analysts have a responsibility to review the information provided and work to interpret its meaning in economic terms. If your institution has direct exposure to oil and gas loans, we ask that you help us by providing additional information on these loans. Some things to think about when completing your FR 2644 report are: Does your institution offer these types of loans? Are the loans delinquent? Do the loans have separate impairment accounts? To support our data analysis, we ask that you provide explanations on unusual fluctuations, as appropriate, so that statistics analysts and the end users of the data can properly determine and complete their economic analysis.

Additional information can be provided to us via email or phone. We look forward to hearing from you soon.
